World peace is held up while Germany hunts around for her lost pen.

Two college honorary degrees received inside of a week serve as a good decoration for Governor Clement.

It isn't so much a question whether the Germans have broken the armistice as whether they are going to sign the

It was surely adding insult to injury if the Germans were so contemptible as to burn French battle flags of 1870-71,

July 1 looms up as a strong point of demarcation between wetness and dryness, as the presidential proclamation expected to intervene in war-time prohibition does not come.

With 900 of its graduates and former students entering war service and a score of them giving up their lives in that service, the University of Vermont is quite a war college.

The tabulated casualties of the United States in the war have now reached the total of 289,000; and the end is not yet, for the tabulation does not include the prisoners or those who have died in American camps. The figures will easily pass the 300,000 mark.

Frank A. Bruce That sort of prank was tried out in Mid-dlebury recently, and the two men who dlebury recently, and the two men who relatives in Woodstock, N. H. appropriated machines were assessed $25 and costs in municipal court. It would last week by train for a few days' stay have been cheaper for the men to hire with friends in Newport, N. H. the machines for the day.

The Germans have forgotten the "duress" which they exerted on the Belgians, the French, the British, the Americans and, in fact, on any nation opposed t their policy of world domination. The only "duress" they can remember is that alleged to be forced on them by the allies in the peace terms. They have forgotten how richly they deserve a slight measure of the hardships which they laid on their enemies during the war.

. The problem of how to apportion the German war fleet among the allies seems to have been quite effectually solved through the action of the German seamen in scuttling the vessels at Scapa Flow. It promised to become a very delicate matter for settlement, and here we have the solution served right up to us. Perhaps the Germans didn't realize what a service they were performing.

After scuttling their surrendered warships, the German seamen made their way to shore and did some more of the "Kamerad" mockery, no doubt smirking as they appealed to the humanity of their captors, and then clicking their heels together as they saluted each other as if in triumph over another Lusitania sunk. The blind servility of these people to the military idea is ridiculous.

Inasmuch as Germany was able to conceal a number of warships from the eyes and the knowledge of the allies, there is every reason to believe that Germany has concealed a considerable amount of financial resources although her spokesmen have been crying poverty, poverty. The plea of poverty needs to be taken with reserve, and when we begin to speculate on how Germany will be able to make financial reparation this mental reservation should also be taken into consideration. Germany is probably not such a poverty-stricken nation as she would like to have the allies believe at this very moment.

The formation of a post of the American Legion in Barre may be the forerunner of the organization of a company of the Vermont National Guard to replace the two companies which were organized in Barre for the former regiment of state militia. Although it is perhaps true that the service men in the great war have had their full share of military duties it is likely that many of them will be willing, if not anxious, to go into the Vermont National Guard. There are hundreds of veterans of the war in Barre and from their number could be chosen a splendid nucleus for the building up of a company of the National Guard.
